

The Art of Meaning

Love, money, justice, truth, nature and culture as divine and terrenal ecological concepts which configurate a mental state only if we think about them as such. First of all we ought to put in order our definitions of such concepts to avoid pre/mis-conceptions and allow our search clear meanings through an holistic venue to proceed. This of course must be done inside of what we should understand as an historical construction of human necessities and interests. Nothing strange at all if we remind ourselves that this is what we are already doing right now. We are talking about now. Not exactly about what is either new or what belongs to the past. In other words, now understood as something free to be constantly and endlessly redefined. This is what goes and is goin on. We won't stop it. We will just redefine it.

So let me say a word about beauty to which no one has been introduced and talks about things we don't have a need to think about. The mental state derived from it needs no previous configuration. We are talking about the pleasure derived from beauty: when the sky opens itself to drop words down here from nowhere to let us hear no more numbers but music, then, gratitude prevails over envy or admiration and no one expects to hear your confession. This is a credible path not due to believers but just to existence.